

the video relay service has improved the communication options available to deaf broadband users, and has in many instances made better employment opportunities available as well by improving communication access. Further cutting of the VRS project funding would only result in less quality, longer wait times, and in effect undoing all of the progress that the project has made. The FCC should strongly reconsider reducing the funding in favor of continued progress on the project.